MeridianLink Adds Proprietary Intrusion Detection Logic to MCL

COSTA MESA, CA – January 17, 2008 - MeridianLink deploys proprietary intrusion detection logic for its Mortgage Credit Link product. The intrusion detection logic is designed to recognize ordering patterns that deviate from the customer's normal business practices as a way to enhance the MCL system's preexisting security options. When triggered, the intrusion logic will immediately notify the CRA of the anomaly and limit further access.

While this feature is designed as a security tool, its broader benefit is its ability to mitigate the costs of a data breach. A high percentage of data breaching occurs from the mishandling of end-user credentials. These situations can range anywhere from employees who disclose their user name and password on a note at their desk to disgruntled ex-employees.

"We understand that the damage caused by a security breach is not just measured in the size of the breach or the cost of the breach. A security breach places CRA's in a no win situation where they are forced to decide if and how much to charge the customer" says Doug Glagola, VP of Industry Relations. With early detection and preventions in place, fewer credit reports are able to be pulled, reducing the damages caused in the event of a security breach. The intrusion detection logic is one of many security measures that gives the CRA's more flexibility to work with customers and increases the odds that they will continue a business relationship after the dust of a security breach settles.
